*The teacher who walks in the shadow of the temple,

He looked up at the stars, then at the field he was lying in. The wind swept over him, and in a most gradual fashion he began to sense the symphony of existence around him. It was a peaceful, quiet, gently sloping field, but its inaudible music grew more persistent. He liked being here. It was nice and pleasant, a place where one could ponder the eternal.

He did not want to get up, but his better sense told him that he must. He wondered about what he had learned. He didn't really know if he had learned anything, but he had changed, and in his own view, it was for the better.

The music kept coming at him, and he just had to laugh. They, the people outside this field of existence, did not know this laughter. When they laughed, it was to escape their feeling of insecurity. He accepted this. It was too bad they would never understand; part of him liked to get people to see things his own way, but it was useless. They were too old, their ideas too set.

He left the field and walked towards a light. He was not thinking now, just being. He said hello to the people he passed. They replied and passed on. He was content.

Later that night in the zone between wakefulness and sleep, he knew that there was something wrong. He wasn't quite sure what it was; he would have to think about it tomorrow when he was less tired.

The next morning he got up early and was astounded by the beautiful day. Everything was perfect in a messy way, and he was appreciating it honestly, not because it had been impressed on him that it was something to be appreciated but because it demanded appreciation in its own right. He was seeking the ultimate in peace, something they said the world could not give. He would persevere in that search.

To begin,
I'm not sure.

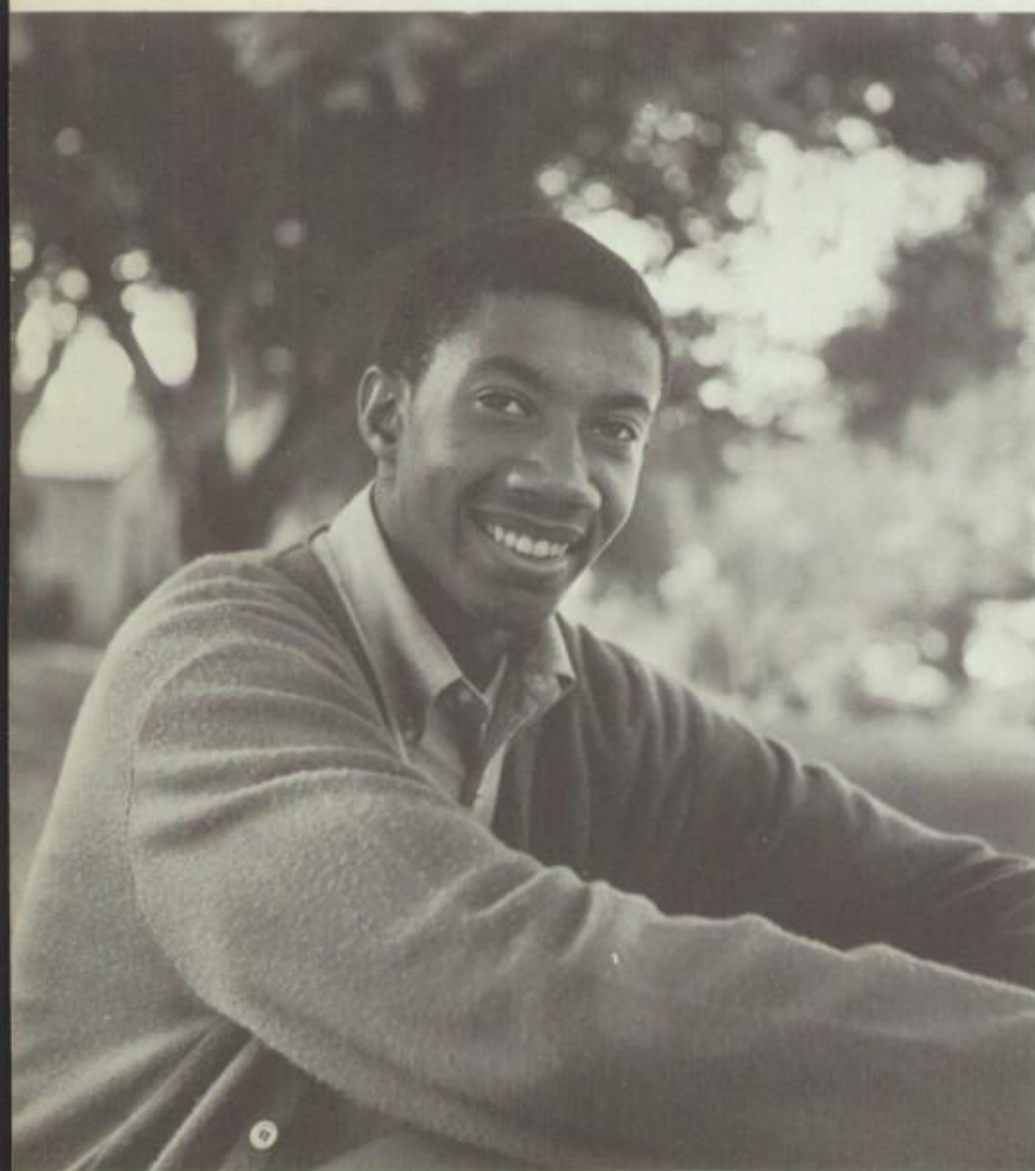

Academic excellence the key?
Study, you'll reach the top.
Sure, but what about human relations, intense intellectual society?
Try to understand, try to help, don't get Turned off.
Be enthusiastic, love life, don't get too
Turned on.

Loud noises? Talking?
Distinguishable Speech?
"And then you have the gall to ask me if I've gotten my hair cut."
No tact—Superiority Complex.
I'm a nuisance. I'm sorry.
I try. I can assure you I'll grant your wish soon.
For now—I'm sorry.

To end.
For some it was wrong.
I sympathize and am sorry.
For me it was painful,
but Right.
I'm thankful.

A boy walked along a road. He had been walking for quite a while and the cold night air descended upon him. As he walked, cars passed, and passed, and passed. Just then, a car containing a lone man stopped and the man asked, "Want a lift?" "Yes, thank you," the boy replied. The man was dressed in black—black coat, black shirt, black hat, and very sinister black eyes. The boy got in and they drove on. As they drove, the stern and cross man asked the young boy, "What do you think about life?" The boy replied, "Life is a wonderful learning experience. It is so vast and so full of things to do that one can never stop learning. Life is like a mythical character I learned about in school. This man was destined to push a rock up a mountain forever and ever. Every time he would get to one place, it seemed as though he still had much further to go. He could never reach the end of his journey. Life is that way. You can never learn everything. You always have something that you will never learn in your lifetime because there are more things to learn than time to learn them in." The car approached a small mesa and the boy said, "You can let me off here, sir." The man stopped the car and let the boy out. As the boy prepared to leave, the man said, "Is this one of your stops on the perpetual mountains of life?" "Yes," the boy said. Then the man said, "Beware, for I am the summit of that mountain of life, the end of that journey or any journey. You and I will meet on that summit someday, and then you will be MINE; but for now, learn all you can, for you will see me again." The man drove off into the darkness, but as he drove off I noticed the license plate under the light, and it read D.86. Silently I thanked him, for he was giving me plenty of time to learn.

A sphere was molded of clay, and it moved. It did not move of its own accord, but was forced. The force was a push not a pull. But the inertia gained by the still lingering push, enabled this sphere to wander a little. The sphere went along smooth courses and rough courses, in ruts and out, until the gained inertia began to overcome the pushing. The sphere had been fortunate, though, for the pushing had set it on a narrow but smooth path to roll on. Ahead was a very narrow spot in the path, with great chasms on each side, and a hill beyond that.

Now the sphere was on the narrow spot of the path, and looked into one chasm and saw that it was full of strange colors which hid the bottom. But the sphere, almost at the foot of the hill, looked up and saw several paths which lead over the hill. Some paths lead around the hill, some wandered up, but one steep path went straight up and over.

Oliver Wendell Holmes stated in his Memorial Day Speech of 1884: "I think that, as life is action and passion, it is required of a man that he should share the passion and action of his time at peril of being judged not to have lived." Mr. Holmes is saying that in order for a man to live his life to its fullest extent, he must partake in the passion and action of his time. It is necessary for each of us to experience and judge the aspirations and pretensions of our society if we expect to live a successful life in a time characterized by dissension, strife, and great social change.

Public Service

A little time, effort, and a lot of understanding and love is prerequisite to man's humanity to man. Ignore the self and become conscious of what others can give. Life is but existence without traveling a two-way street towards ultimate freedom and expression. One must in truth love his neighbor. Smile.
